

Dear FCC,

The violence that is on television today, which is quite a lot, has a very high impact on our youth. From a young age they are exposed to violent movies and violence that to them may seem very real.

However the restrictions that are offered, such as parental control and ratings of television programs, are very beneficial. I do not believe that it is your job to make sure that the youth of today is not exposed to this violence, it is the responsibility of the adult in charge of the child or children. A reduction of the amount of violence would be nice to see, but you have already made it much easier for parents and/or guardians to stay in control of the amount of violence their child, or children are exposed to.

Student at Ball State University